The Elemental Court of Glaciem

“Impossible!”, the sharp tone of troubled voices cut through the night like a blade sharper than sound itself. When a small parchment note arrived at the circular building of the Elemental Court of Glaciem in Iceria, the capital city of the ice kingdom, a giant panic erupted amongst the representatives of Altaltis, Electria and Natura, just 3 of the 5 Patron members. But one seat was empty, the seat of the representative of Collossus.

After the sun set, and the full moon shined through the transparent ice in the windows, King Arsus finally stood up and began speaking: “We should help them.”, he said. The silence in the court room was finally broken by Lena, Queen of Atlantis and representative of her kingdom: “But look at those burn marks on the paper.”, the rest of the court nodded in awe. Because of that reaction Arsus immediately walked up to the middle of the chamber and started speaking: “When Glaciem was in danger, and our kingdom was in ruins, we were experiencing identical problems. But we did not falter. I saw the rallied forces of Lena and Vision march onto the battlefields and defending my kingdom without questions. Glaciem will not stand still while its ally is in danger, we will not just sit here and wait until the danger reaches us!”, he shouted.

Judge Glacier announced: “The King has spoken. I sadly cannot change his decision.”

When everyone had left the room, Glacier asked Arsus a question: “Do you think it is wise to go to war, again?”. Arsus just looked at him, transferring a message without needing to speak.

After those events in the courtroom, and because the administration at that time was way too much, the judge had to write down everything that had happened, or at least the verdict, so he wrote down:

“DM ʻITX HFX ZCXMT, FTW RNTMM IT PFTXR XP FT FTTF ʻXTTX DM

And that translates to:

“The king spoke, and ruled in favor of the option to support our allies.”

It actually was a tradition to write an extensive document about those events, but judge Glacier decided not to record this specific decision to prevent any future backfires from it.

The sun rose; and began it's long journey trough the sky, though it wasn't the only one that was preparing for a journey... Back at the barracks soldiers were preparing for the big cross. The ocean in ALJiVi-World isn't as easy to cross as the ocean on Earth. Inbetween the vast continents that we have there are streches of seas the could be called oceans by humans. The planet ALJiVi-World rests on is giant, 100 times bigger than the Sun in the Human Universe. So while the continents are also giant, there are so few of them that the bodies of waters seporating them just are giant enough.

The armies of Glaciem at that time have developed this new kind of ability, walking on water. This may sound like something that only Atlantisians could do, but in reality they did not simply set their foot on water. The soldiers of the ice kingdom created platforms just the size of their feet under them the second they were about to step further.

The rallied forces of Glaciem marched trough the ocean on sunset.

The Liberation of Collossus

Sunrise, on the beaches of Collossus a rythmical sound echoed from across the sea.
Thud, thud, thud, thud...

And the soldiers and guards of Vulcanus sprinted to the beach as they watched something getting bigger at the horizon, blinding the sun. No wait, the thing was coming closer.

As the rythmical sound of footsteps marching in perfect sync got louder across the island, the soldiers wanted to try out their new invention.

A few days beforehand a new invention arose in the army, an invention that could rule the next few generations of battles: the Spiker, it had a musket style shape, a long barrel, and a trigger just at the hands. You did not need to reload the Spiker manually, you just simply loaded it with your power. You see, the Spiker shoots spikes made out of ice, so to reload it you just form one inside of the chamber, you pull the trigger, and it shoots into the barrel outward. You may think: Why not just do that with your powers too? Well that would be inprecise, you would need to be extremely well skilled to do so.

The soldiers of Glaciem raised their Spikers up, with that invention a new job arose in the army. The people wielding the Spiker were called Spikersmen. All of the Spikersmen present on the shore of Collossus raised their weapon up and aimed at the oposing soldiers.

BANG!, the sound echoed trough the island forcing its way to the eardrums. It was a short time, half a second and gone they were, the Vulcanus soldiers.

With the first line already gone the Spikersmen hit hard on the beach, within minutes they had the whole island surrounded in a ring of soldiers all around on each beach, cliff and any border they had with the water. Then they started running towards the capital: Titanus.

As the soldiers ran towards the capital in the center of the continental island, they made the ring smaller, which in turn caused a feeling of condensation as the ring got thicker the closer to the center they went. Along the way they made a few shots. But then they arrived at the capital. The soldiers weren't expecting much but they were looking out for any threats.

With that knowledge Arsus commanded his soldiers to go onto the mountains and wait there for his sign. One by one the Glacarian soldiers replaced the red flags with their own. Generals at the feet of the mountains looked up and were surprised by their own flag being removed. Suddenly Arsus lowered his hand and pointed downwards.

All spikersmen suddenly shot a giant dome of spikes straight down the mountains right to the main forum and every area around it. The sound was so loud that clouds started moving to the other direction: BANG!

A quarter of the soldiers were already to the ground, their fire dying and them disappearing in to the afterlife. Then the soldiers started running down the mountains. Sadly with that their speed became too much for them to handle, the soldiers all fell downwards. The fire army drew all their blades and jumped to the invading forces. It was a ruthless scene, shots firing, blades clashing, spears breaking, flags burning, ground freezing. One side of the capital became as warm as the sun, while the other side became as cold as the moon.

As the sides clashed 2 sounds stood out on the battlefield, a horn and a very sharp flute. The horn whined with a calm calling sound while the flute resounded with an ear-piercing sound that cut through the air. The 2 sides were calling each other onto the battlefield, and 2 fellows were about to meet.

Sunset, fire soldiers already weakening in power and their first resistance faltering as the invasion continued around them. They knew it was too late, but then something shook the ground... At the peak of the highest mountain the 2 clashing lights, one blue, one red, created escalating shockwaves that on their turn escalated the battle going on below.

Arsus delivered another blow as Pyrothonis, the fire nation lead general and governor of the colony, flew back. But then the general shot a fireball at Arsus knocking him down as well. While the two were fighting, millions of enslaved Kaltaris stood up and broke themselves free from the steel chains. As the battle continued down below the 2 flashing lights on the mountain continued to clash with each other as Arsus and Pyrothonis continued battling above the chaos down below.

"Fancy seeing you here!", Pyrothonis said.
Arsus responded: "I just wanted to say the same."

All of the sudden a blue flash hit the general knocking him back onto the ground. "I knew you would conquer many lands, but why Collossus?", he asked. Pyrothonis lunged forward but was quickly knocked back.

Glacarian soldiers made their way onto the mountain arresting the general as green banners were once again lowered from the posts. Xanji, the king of Collossus, ran to Arsus and began asking questions about the conquest and liberation. Arsus however, was busy making sure everything went to plan: “Make sure to carry Pyrothonis away to the Prison of Frost. Make sure to put everything in our records.”

Xanji: “I want to see the one who burnt my kingdom.”

Arsus: “That will not be possible, King Zanzi.”

Xanji: “Make sure to write my name down correctly...”

Arsus: “Ill make sure Csanghi will be written on the documents.”

“Recorder! Write the name of their king: ‘𐌸𐌹𐌶𐌹𐌸𐌹’

Xanji: “That’s not...”

Imperial Goals

The doors opened with a hissing sound made from trapped air. In just a few moments the whole plaza went from empty to overflowing. Xanji was back at Collossus, so was everyone else of the patron. Arsus however had other plans for Glaciem after he saw what Vulcanus had done.

The people were cheering, unpatiently waiting for what their king had to say. Crowds went silent once the doors opened and Arsus stepped out of the palace onto the balcony.

“An era of war has filled our times...” Xanji started making his way to Glaciem as he noticed Iceria was empty... “...an era of disunity...” Xanji heard the sound coming from the plaza as he slammed his hands into the ice. A giant pillar of rock arose breaking trough the frozen continent and launching him over 3 sets of walls onto the plaza, he hid himself quickly behind a pillar as Arsus continued: “...these times call for desperate measures.” Silence filled the plaza even more than before, nobody knew what the king was anouncing, but it seemed urgent and important. “At this day, the 1st of Glacimorn, the first day of this shining year, I am reforming Glaciem into a new nation... a nation of unity, a strong nation...” Xanji was now deciding in his head if he did hear this correctly, if this was actually happening... “I am reforming Glaciem into the Moon Empire! With the goal to unite the world!” Crowds started cheering, soldiers poured in from the doors, standing proudly. The flag of Glaciem, with the white snowflake on blue, was lowered from its post. Xanji watched in surprise as the new flag was risen onto the post, flying in the wind, a white eagle on blue.

Still surprised by the event, Xanji was running onto his ship, he ordered to message the Patron members, excluding Arsus, to meet in Titanus, the capital of Collossus. He didn't know what the Moon Empire would do, but leaders do not simply form empires for no reason.
